Now is the time where the innate analog aspects of humans are deemed a defect, and the digital perfection of machines is worshiped. Still, we need to talk about our nature because we have two traits that machines do not have. They are talent that creates something non-existent with excellent technologies, and humanity that builds a new meaning system for the present and the future. When these two are converged completely to become huality, we can secure the driving and constructive direction for the future to allow us to face the world. We have lost balance and put talent above humanity as we have witnessed that talent works better for economic prosperity and material abundance. In consequence, however, we have lost health and maturity. In the absence of health and maturity, the direction for the future and sustainability cannot stand. It looks as if we are more than ready to hand the center stage of the future to AI in order to keep enjoying prosperity and abundance in the future. It is déjà vu or the latest version of human alienation seen during modern industrialization. It never is possible to find the strengths and desirable direction that would bring us to confront the future if we alienate ourselves. That is why we need introspection to look deep inside ourselves with fundamental views. The pandemic might be an opportunity to stop being preoccupied with prosperity and abundance and asking for more with no sense of direction and start asking why and restore the fundamentals. In order to change without being corrupt, we need to practice introspection to let huality in us shine. Only then can we talk about hope before it gets too late.
